

Experience maps. Heuristics reviews. A/B Testing. You know what these terms mean.

Sometimes, the companies who need the most UX help don't quite know how to communicate their needs, and end up with the wrong kind of designer. Assembly is aiming to fix that.

Various professions throughout history have evolved to include a language all their own. From its very inception, graphic design has been no exception.

As this discipline has matured throughout the centuries, we find ourselves in an era wherein design is steeped in more mysterious terminology than ever. And because we're on internet-time, this language changes faster than you can imagine.

Many of today's companies are trying their hardest to keep up with the latest in UX and UI design, but find it difficult to walk the walk without a designer already on staff. How can they rely on themselves to hire the right designer when they can't even keep up with the latest in Design Sprinting?

Whether you're looking to overhaul the entire user experience of an app, prefer working visually with a UX designer to make those wireframes sing, or you're itching to take on the juiciest UX research in the industry, we've got access to employers looking for all of them.

We consider our employers to be of the highest order: conscientious, visionary, and obsessed with high-quality execution.

We've been in the trenches here in Denver for almost two decades, have been deeply involved in successful product launches, and have learned what it takes for a principal-level designer to flourish.

We're looking for the best designers in the world, designers who approach their craft from a thoughtful, wise perspective which produces elegant products that surprise and delight their users.

Does this describe you? Give us a call.
