

A FINAL VOICEMAIL

By: Kenneth L. Arnold Jr.

I picked up the phone to give you a call, It rang until I realized there would no longer be an answer on the other end, Every breath paused to exhale a painful void that's ever present, Yet I decided to leave you with these words,

The years traveled around the sun are littered with footprints of you,

Moments and memories that differ between individuals you knew throughout this journey called life, A journey where the son's cry became a brother's love and a multitude of friendships forged along the way, A life forever altered when she stared back upon your face with eyes and ways of you, Then I, an only son, a name sake to carry forward every dream that became deferred, And finally she gave way to a soft whisper that concealed the genuine side of you behind her loving smiles, The three of us being the one of you, making you as complete as the number itself, Although not perfect, God allowed you to be just right as you aged to the day you'd aged no more,

So I appreciate you guiding me from your life's experiences, knowingly and unknowingly, Yet the ability to hear you say I love you too son one more time goes beyond understanding, So I stand ready to be a son, a brother and friend to all along my journey without you, I pray that I made you proud.

Rest well
