General information:

- All permission guidelines apply to both digital and print formats (i.e., an image found via a Google search requires permission in the same way as an image found in a book).

- All third-party content must be accredited to the source regardless of whether permission is necessary.

- To apply for permission when it’s necessary, contact the copyright holder and cite full usage information. For academic books and articles, apply through the copyright intermediary Copyright Clearance Center/RightsLink after signing up for an account. For other content, apply through the publisher or rights holder. For unpublished material, contact the author. A sample application letter is included in the T&F Author Guidelines.

- Permission must be sought from the originator of the content (i.e., if originally published in a book, then included in an article, permission is needed from the book’s publisher, not the journal).

- Permission clearance may necessitate paying a fee, sometimes negotiable or nominal, to the copyright holder.

- If permission is applied for but denied, or if an application is sent and receives no response, drop or replace the content.

- If using multiple excerpts from the same source, apply for permission for the entirety of the proposed usage.

- If reusing your own content that was previously published, including in a T&F book or journal, treat it as third-party content and apply for permission if necessary.

- Please submit a permission log listing all third-party content and include proof of permission with your final manuscript if requested. A sample log is included in the T&F Author Guidelines.

- For more detailed information, see the T&F Author Guidelines. For all questions, consult with your editorial assistant.
