

PSYCH 403: Motivation

Autumn 2018 • University of Washington

Instructor: Ann Culligan

Overview

This course explores the physiological, cognitive and psychosocial aspects of human motivation, including ingestion, sexual behaviors, addiction, performance, emotions, and control.

Role of Service-Learning in the Course

By engaging in Service Learning, students in Psych 403 will have the opportunity to fulfill their own motivational needs while helping to meet the needs of others. In addition, a service-learning position, and the associated course assignment, will provide students with the opportunity to examine the real-life applications of theories and research discussed in the classroom.

Assignments Related to Service-Learning

Students who participate in service learning will incorporate discussion of their experiences, along with research on a related topic, in five short papers throughout the quarter.

Carlson Leadership & Public Service Center

Center for Experiential Learning & Diversity • University of Washington
171 Mary Gates Hall • (206) 616-2885 • <http://exp.washington.edu/carlson>